

BEING MAN: Discovering and Offering Our Masculine Gifts

This 12-week study and process group for men will explore the pathway to discovering our masculine gifts, accepting them and offering those gifts in our work, our friendships, our partnerships and families. As a study group, the group will engage with new ideas. As a process group, we will look at our interactions within the group as a reflection of our interactions with the world. While group members will do some reading and practices between groups to open up new areas for exploration, the primary work in meetings will be the focus on mindfully finding our right relationship with our own purpose. The dark and the light of relationships, sex, work, finances and spirit will be brought into group as we explore our own male human experience. We will look at physical, spiritual, interpersonal, emotional, sexual, and psychological ways of offering our gifts to the world, and our unique barriers to doing just that.

This group will be comprised of 6-8 members, a group leader, and a co-leader. All members will commit for the duration of the group. (It is understood that absences are unavoidable at times.)

The group will do a small amount of reading each week from writings by David Deida, Rick Belden, Chogyam Trungpa and others as a starting point for seeing our full role in the world. These writings have very different takes on the journey, and we will work with their ideas to find our own path. We will explore mindfulness, and use this skill to explore barriers to authentic engagement with ourselves and our world. Together we will also explore the confounding relationship with the feminine – and find a sense of solidity there.
